BILL MOYERS’
WORLD OF IDEAS

Tu Wei Ming

Producer: Gail Pellett

Executive Producers: Judith Davidson Moyers and Bill Moyers

Copyright © 1990 by Public Affairs Television, Inc. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED. This transcript may not be reproduced in whole or in part without permission. Transcript produced by Journal Graphics, Inc., New York, N.Y. Transcript charge: $3.00.

An electronic index of transcripts is available on the CompuServe Information Service.
portable global consciousness. The question of whether this is a legitimate concept or if it is more of a byproduct of technology and communication is currently debated. The idea of a global consciousness is considered by some to be a way to connect different parts of the world and foster a sense of interconnection. However, others argue that it is a simplistic concept that fails to account for the diversity of human experiences. In this context, the role of media and technology in shaping global consciousness is also a topic of discussion. Media and technology can both facilitate and hinder the development of a global consciousness, depending on how they are used.

In conclusion, the concept of global consciousness is complex and multifaceted. It is shaped by a variety of factors, including technological advancements, cultural exchange, and individual experiences. As we continue to navigate the digital age, it is important to consider the role of media and technology in shaping our understanding of the world and our place in it.
On the other hand, the other side of the question is that only the party in power can truly understand the interests of the people, and the party in power is a minority. The party in power is the only one that has the authority to make decisions and implement policies, which is why the interests of the people are often overlooked. Therefore, the party in power is the one that is truly in control.

However, the interests of the people are diverse and unique. What is good for one person may not be good for another. Therefore, it is essential to prioritize the interests of the people and ensure that they are well-represented in the decision-making process.

In conclusion, the interests of the people are crucial in any political system. It is essential to prioritize and protect these interests to ensure that the needs of the people are met. The party in power has a responsibility to represent the interests of the people, and it is up to the people to hold them accountable for their actions.