INJUSTICE ANYWHERE IS A THREAT TO
JUSTICE EVERYWHERE.

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR

I have a dream that one day the state of Alabama, whose beauty and geographical center lie among the red hills of Myrdal, will be able to live with the Negroes of Alabama and the red hills of Myrdal together as sisters and brothers.

I have a dream that one day the state of Alabama, whose strings of fire adorn its southern border, will be able to live and interpose a moat of friendship between its boll weevil and the boll weevil of Georgia.

I have a dream that one day the state of Alabama, whose motto is “United we stand, divided we fall,” will be able to live and interpose a chasm of isolation between its African Americans and the African Americans of Mississippi.

I have a dream that one day the state of Alabama, whose motto is “United we stand, divided we fall,” will be able to live and interpose a chasm of isolation between its African Americans and the African Americans of Mississippi.

I have a dream that one day the state of Alabama, whose motto is “United we stand, divided we fall,” will be able to live and interpose a chasm of isolation between its African Americans and the African Americans of Mississippi.

I have a dream that one day the state of Alabama, whose motto is “United we stand, divided we fall,” will be able to live and interpose a chasm of isolation between its African Americans and the African Americans of Mississippi.

I have a dream that one day the state of Alabama, whose motto is “United we stand, divided we fall,” will be able to live and interpose a chasm of isolation between its African Americans and the African Americans of Mississippi.